(A.J.B.) 8 Champollion justly points out that the towns denoted by the modern Arabic names are not as a rule on the actual site of the ancient towns which they represent, and argues that Al-Farama was rebuilt by the Arabs nearer to the sea than the ancient Pelusium, which is said by Strabo to have been 2,040 yards from the sea, the prophet; and its name was taken from Faramunus<sup>1</sup>. It was exceedingly wonderful, and one of the most ancient of foundations of which there is a record. It is said that there was a way from this Pol. 57 a C1ty to tne isand of Cyprus on dry land, but the sea covered it. The sea also covered the quarry of black and white marble of Gaza, and the quarry of white marble which was in Libya<sup>2</sup>. There were at AlFarama many churches and monasteries, which were wrecked by the Persians<sup>3</sup> and the Arabs; but it is said that the wall of the city remains to the present day. The book of FaMil Misr relates that there was in the city of Tinnis a governor called Ibn al-Mudabbar, who sent men to Al-Farama to pull down the stonework of the gateways on the eastern side of that city. But when those who were sent to extract the stones arrived, the people of Al-Farama went out armed to meet them, and forbad them to extract the stones, saying: These gates are ancient and have never been injured by any king or any other man; how then can we allow you to extract the stones from them, and take them away to another country? It was through these gates also that Jacob, the father of and is put by Champollion at 3,000 yards. Abu Salih states above that the Arab town was on the sea (fol. 19b); Al-Makrizi is evidently wrong...
