

The Constitution of the Government of Newfoundland, in Its Legislative (Classic Reprint)

At no period of the political history of Newfoundland was an acquaintance with its Constitution more necessary than at present. The British Government has, at last, conceded Responsible Government to this Island, and its Local Legislature has recently made important changes in the Laws affecting the Representation of the people in the Legislative Assembly. They are now called upon by those Laws to give vitality to that Constitution, and to discharge the heavy Responsibilities of Self-Government. Every one in the colony is interested in the proper working of that system; and therefore ought in some degree, to be acquainted with its principles: without some knowledge of which, he exposes himself to the censure and inconvenience of living in society without understanding his own political relation to it. All the Dependencies of the British Crown are now in the full enjoyment of Responsible Government, can not but value it as being the root and source of Colonial Freedom and the main-spring of their prosperity; and therefore they must admire it more and more in proportion as they view and comprehend the latent agencies which regulate its movements. The author disclaims all pretensions to originality in the following pages. He professes only to have compiled and condensed the same from such public records and other reliable sources of reference as are not immediately within the reach of the general reader, and he trusts that this compilation will, in some measure, make up for the absence of a more elaborate and complete treatise on this important subject.
