

Decision Making In Operation Iraqi Freedom : Removing Saddam Hussein By Force: 2010

The Strategic Studies Institute (SSI) is pleased to initiate its latest monograph series, Operation IRAQI FREEDOM Key Decisions. SSI started this project in an effort to give leaders of the U.S. Armed Forces some important insights into how military advice was provided to the Nations civilian leadership during the many years including the months before the invasion of the war in Iraq. Understanding the ways that military leaders advise those who exercise civilian control over the military is important for the continuing prosecution of that war, but also for the inevitable next time that the United States considers embarking on such an endeavor. A second objective of this series is to provide military and civilian leaders a clearer picture of what they must do to ensure that U.S. Armed Forces are properly prepared with strategy, doctrine, force structure, equipment, training, and leadership for future operations. Literature about the war in Iraq is already extensive, although as the Foreword states the definitive history of the war is still undoubtedly years away. However, most of the writing by policymakers, journalists, scholars, and other students of national security issues focuses on the effects of various decisions, not on the decisions themselves. For example, there is ample writing about how the 2003 decision to de-Baathify the Iraqi government was executed and what effects it had. How that decision was made, though, has been studied less. With this series, SSI intends to make a valuable addition to the literature on the war in Iraq by addressing the how and why of various key strategic decisions that were made over the past 8-plus years of planning and fighting.
