

Erasmi Concio De Pvero Iesv: A Sermon on the Child Jesus (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Erasmi Concio De Pvero Iesv: A Sermon on the Child Jesus No copy can be traced in any collection, public or private, neither is any notice of it to be found in Knights Lives of Erasmus and Colet, for whose school this swete sermon was written. A second note, pencilled opposite the title, testifies to the copys being, so far as could be ascertained, absolutely unique. This being the case, it seemed almost a pious duty to give to the old translators work, while there was yet time, such an extension of life as it was in the power of a reprint to bestow. Before leaving the description of the book, it should be added that it is printed throughout in black letter; quotations being in small roman type. A study of the translation itself discloses some striking characteristics. There is a rough vigour about it, as in the passage (leaf A vi verso) where the author speaks of that great pursuivant of Christ, John Baptist. Who is of wider imperye, he writes in another place (A v), than he, which they in heaven magnify, they in hell tremble at, this mid world humbly worshippeth? One feature, in particular, the translator has in a high degree of development: a feature strongly marked also in Ralph Robinsons translation of the Utopia. I mean, the attempt to express the force of a Latin word, not by its one nearest equivalent in English, but by an accumulation of partial equivalents.
