Excerpt: ... XXIII WHAT IS RELIGION, AND WHEREIN LIES ITS ESSENCE? In all human societies, at certain periods of their existence, a time has come when religion has first swerved from its original purpose, then, diverging more and more, it has lost sight of that purpose, and has finally petrified into fixed forms, so that its influence on mens lives has become ever less and less. At such times the educated minority cease to believe in the established religious teaching, and only pretend to hold it because they think it necessary to do so in order to keep the mass of the people to the established order of life; but the mass of the people, though by inertia they keep to the established forms of religion, no longer guide their lives by its demands, but guide them only by custom and by the State laws. That is what has repeatedly occurred in various human societies. But what is now happening in our Christian society has never happened before. It never before happened that the rich, ruling, and more educated minority, which has the most influence on the masses, not only disbelieved the existing religion, but was convinced that no religion at all is any longer needed, and, instead of influencing those who are doubtful of the truth of the generally professed religion to accept some religious teaching more rational and clear than the prevalent one, influenced them to regard religion in general as a thing that has [288] outlived its day, and is now not merely a useless, but even a harmful, social organ, like the vermiform appendix in the human body. Religion is regarded by such men, not as something known to us by inward experience, but as an external phenomenon--a disease, as it were, which overtakes certain people, and which we can only investigate by its external symptoms.
