Agent Dimon believes Sheriff Sam Abbot is turning a blind eye toward illegal activities between the bull haulers and Mexican immigrants working at the feed yard. She reluctantly agrees with Dimon that she should act alone because her husband, Keith, and twin sister, Josie, would be too outraged over the KBI's suspicions to be effective; but she secretly resolves to act as a double agent and clear Sam's name. As a cover for her sleuthing, Lottie solicits information from the Mexicans by calling for stories from those families whose ancestors were part of the early colonization of Kansas. Instead, a mysterious old Spanish woman, Francisca Diaz, comes forth to contribute her family history with the claim that the Diaz family has always been in Kansas, a notion that Lottie dismisses. Francisca is known as a healer who keeps many secrets, and she hints at precious documents and then pleads for help to avenge ancient wrongs. Lottie is stunned by the Diazes' prejudice against Mexicans. Meanwhile, Keith, suspecting that Lottie is keeping secrets, watches his wife with growing sorrow and bewilderment. When Francisca is brutally murdered, Lottie discovers that the Diaz family history has a connection with the murder at the feed yard. Lottie senses uneasily that she shouldn't delve into the dark side of low magic without Josie, her anchor, at her side, yet she must rush to strip the veil from old Spanish secrets before the whole investigation ruins her marriage and alienates her sister.
