

Notes and Reviews (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Notes and Reviews To reprint all the forgotten and unsigned journalistic scraps of an eminent author, fleeting papers which he himself refrained from reordering and reissuing, is often to do his memory a cruel disservice. For many of the most eminent men of letters have been obliged, especially in youth, to stoop to pot-boiling, and many under the shelter of anonymity have lapsed into the common frailty of haste and slovenliness. The average gentlemans library is freighted with vast, polyteuchal, definitive editions of popular great authors which, to a literary taste as sensitive, let us say, as Jamess, would seem very largely impressive monuments to national deforestation rather than to a discriminating national literacy. But in the case of Henry James, fortunately or otherwise, we shall, I feel, be spared a completely definitive edition.
