

The Friend: A Religious and Literary Journal (Classic Reprint)

Fijian houses burns unr-casinn-ly ii one eoi-ner; the floor was very si ilt ;u ml n-j nu ybeing made of layers upon layi-i sol niais cominerifini;- with coarse palm-lcuf uiics at tlu bottom and Jjaving for final covfri)ig the beau tifuily-iiiadc white ones for which theS outh Sea islands are celebrated. At one end of the room is a sort of dais, raised about a foot from the rest of the floor, and upon this the principal members of the establishment sleep, There are two small holes or windows at this end of the room through which the pleasant cool trade wind blows refreshingly-. The houses of the well-to-do natives are ahvaj-8 well-kept, clean, and comfortable; at the doorway there is frequently a hollowed log with water in which to wash the feet before entering, a rough mat being placed beside the log to wipe them upon. After our evening meal the inevitable ceremony of Kava drinking had to be gone through. Some very clean and fkirlj prettj girls were brought in having as little clothes on as well could be, and seated themselves in a i-ow on one side of the hut. Sundry ii-iends of the family also assembled, and in a few minutes we were quite a large, and a very merry party. An enormous bowl was taken from its peg upon the wall, and placed between us and the prettj girls. It was a splendid piece of furniture, and had been in the family for many generations; its diameter was over four feet, and a cream-colored enamel covered the greater part of its shallow surface. It had four short legs, and was carved from one solid piece of hard black wood. The Kava, or as it is generally called in the Fiji group, theY angona root, is in appearance not unlike a large horse-radish ;this is scfajK dof its soiled outer skin and cut into little lumps which are handed over to the girls, who put them into their mouths and commence solemnly and methodically to chew.
