Cur hac in tempore duretl Quodfacinus dignum tam longo admiserit avo f Juv. Sat. 10. There are other imitations of Juvenal in this scene, which, like this, are all sufficiently obvious. The zeal you have shewn to-day, whereas before You were but third or fourth, you shall be now Put in the first; which would appear as beggd, If you were present. Therefore Lady P. You shall sway me. Exeunt. ACT V. Scene I. A Room in. Volpones House. Enter Volpone. Volpone.;ELL, I am here, and all this brunt is past. I neer was in dislike with my disguise Till this fled moment: here twas good, in private; But in your public,--cave whilst I breathe. Fore God, my left leg gan to have the cramp, And I apprehended straight some power had struck me With a dead palsy:7 Well! I must be merry, 7 Fore God, my left leg gan to have the cramp, And I apprehended straight some power had struck me With a dead palsy. Alluding to a piece of ancient superstition, that all sudden consternations of mind, and sudden pains of the body, such as cramps, palpitations of the heart, &c., were ominous, and presages of evil. Hence we may explain, as Mr. Upton remarks, a passage in Plautuss Miles Gloriosus: Schel. Timeo quod rerun gesserim hie, if a dorsus totus prurit. And in his Bacchides, Nicobulus says, Caput prurit, perii. Whal. This note, the whole of which Whalley took from Upton, is carefully retained in his corrected copy. That two men of learning (for Whalley was also a scholar) should fall into such absurdities, is truly pitiable. Volpone, by lying so long immovable in his constrained situation, naturally begins to feel the cramp: this, his fears, magnified by his guilt, rep...
