

Barsoom: Thuvia, Maid Of Mars

But I must go to her, insisted Carthoris. You say that there are no women in Lothar. Then she must be among men, and if this be so I intend to be near where I may defend her if the need arises. Tario will have his way, insisted Jav. He sent you away and you may not return until he sends for you. Then I shall go without waiting to be sent for. Do not forget the bowmen, cautioned Jav. I do not forget them, replied Carthoris, but he did not tell Jav that he remembered something else that the Lotharian had let dropsomething that was but a conjecture, possibly, and yet one well worth pinning a forlorn hope to, should necessity arise. Carthoris started to leave the room. Jav stepped before him, barring his way. I have learned to like you, red man, he said; but do not forget that Tario is still my jeddak, and that Tario has commanded that you remain here. Carthoris was about to reply, when there came faintly to the ears of both a womans cry for help. With a sweep of his arm the Prince of Helium brushed the Lotharian aside, and with drawn sword sprang into the corridor without. In this, the fourth of Burroughs Mars novels, it is the son of John Carter, Cathoris, who faces danger in the hopes of winning the freedom (and perhaps the heart) of the desperate maiden of Mars Thuvia.
